The notion of avoidant attachment disorder actually takes from the concept of different attachment styles laid down by the 1970's, psychologist Mary Ainsworth Ainsworth. Based on her observations from the now-famous "Strange Situation" study, she concluded that there were three major styles of attachment: secure attachment, ambivalent-insecure attachment, and avoidant-insecure attachment. In case of the last, children tend to avoid parents or caregivers. When offered a choice, these children show no preference between a caregiver and a complete stranger. Research has suggested that this attachment style might be a result of abusive or neglectful caregivers. Children who are punished for relying on a caregiver will learn to avoid seeking help in the future. When they grow up as adults, their lack of emotional attachment is exhibited in personal relationships too.

But not as conflicted as we singletons seem to feel about them having sex. Typically, people who are close to conjoined twins come to adjust and see them as different but normal; they seem fairly untroubled by the idea of conjoined twins pursuing sex and romance. But those who are watching from afar cannot abide.
